Help with exams

Taking an online exam is a new and different experience for many students. While most of the steps are similar to preparing for an in-class exam, there are some unique challenges that can make it more difficult to succeed.

Online class help can provide students with a way to take an online test without having to worry about distractions or proctoring. This can be helpful for students who are balancing work, family and other obligations. Many campuses also have online learning centers that offer students a quiet space to study for an exam.

Students should be sure to check the status of their assignments regularly, and they should ask for a sample submission before entrusting their homework to an online tutor. This can help them identify any errors or inconsistencies in writing style and citations. They should also keep in mind that the tutor may be working from a different location than they are, so it's important to have clear communication about deadlines and expectations.

If the learning outcomes for your lab experiences focus on interpreting data and less on collecting it, you may need to provide your students with real-world datasets that they can analyze themselves. This could be as simple as giving them published data sets from scientific groups or research publications, or you could consider providing students with video-recorded experiments they can watch and critique. You can even use a tool like PebblePad to support the creation of student e-portfolios that document the lab process in a sequential way. This allows students to review their own work and gain confidence in their abilities.

Help with discussion boards

Discussion boards can be a powerful tool for online learning, but they also require some work. For example, Nursing Informatics in Health Care can be difficult to follow multiple threads and respond to classmates' comments in a timely manner. If you are struggling with a course that requires frequent participation in discussions, consider seeking help from an online class tutor.

For students whose first language is not English, the writing component of an online discussion can feel intimidating. It can also be challenging for students to understand how their instructors evaluate a discussion board response.

Instructors often expect a certain word count in responses and evidence that the student has read the assigned materials or viewed the related videos in response to the discussion prompt. In addition, they may ask students to assess other students' responses. This can help establish a community of inquiry and promote democratic assessment. However, this can be time-consuming and frustrating for many students. In addition, online discussion boards are not always accessible.
